

The Kilkenny Whiskey Guild

The first written account of distillation in Ireland comes from Kilkenny in the 14th Century with the Red Book of Ossory and the Kilkenny Whiskey Guild will celebrate and highlight this history.

The Kilkenny Whiskey Guild is a collection of 10 establishments throughout Ireland's Medieval capital. Each premises will stock a minimum of 60 Irish Whiskeys and will assist in the customers experience through knowledgeable staff, tasting flights, food pairings and mixology.

Regular Whiskey events will be held in each of the Guild Houses designed to heighten the public's knowledge of Irish Whiskey history, production and various styles. The Guild aims to make Kilkenny the leading Whiskey tourism destination in Ireland.

We invite all to join us in the Marble City where new friends will be made, old friends will be revisited and all while enjoying a drop of an ancient Irish innovation.

Blends

Irish blended whiskey contains both grain whiskey and either malt or single pot still whiskey (sometimes all three are blended together). It was with the introduction of the Coffey still and the option to use less expensive grain spirit that blended whiskeys became possible, available and popular.

Pot Still

Pot still whiskey is a style of whiskey that is unique to Ireland. It is whiskey that is made entirely from malted and unmalted barley in copper pot stills. Traditionally this type of whiskey was also known as 'Pure Pot Still Whiskey'. Midleton is the main distillery in Ireland producing pure pot still whiskey.

Single Grain

Grain Whiskey is distilled in a 'Coffey Still'. Cheaper grains can be used in a Coffey still such as maize and wheat. A small percentage of malted whiskey (around 15%) is often used to provide the necessary enzymes required to allow the starch in the grain to be converted into fermentable sugars. Grain whiskey has a much lighter taste than malt whiskey.
